Among the annoyances to which people who judge by the exterior are frequently suistaken in their estimates of the mass of humanity as it reveals itself amid the crowds of a busy city. Numerons are the ludierous blunders which have come to our knowledge in conesquence of the too hasty deference of mankind toward outward appearances, and nowhere is it more extensively developed than on board the steamers, where men whose ambition in life has never soared beyond some very humble pursuit, often pass owing to something distingue in their appearance, for Senators, Ex-Governors and what not, until accident reveals them in their true colors to their fellow-passengers. A ludicrous scene occurred a few days since in an omnibus, of which a dignified gentleman of very saturine aspect and immseulate clothing was a constant patron.

This gentleman carried, morning and evening, a gold-headed cane, a small tin box with a handle, in which were supposed to be deposited large amounts of coin and the secrets of an important banking business—impressions which his supercitions demeanor only strenglatened. One morning, however, the fatal secret leaked out and all deference was at an end. The gentleman had laid his carefully-guarded box upon his knees, and was absorbed in the morning paper, when a couple of pretty ladies entered. Lifting the casket by the handle as he shifted his seat, the tracherous lid, which had accidently been left unlocked, flew open, and out fell—a roulean of gold? a troussen of diamonds? jeweis—ingots-papers!
